

THANKSGIVING, LAST SUNDAY OF PENTECOST, YEAR B, NOVEMBER 24, 2024

This is the fable about the Cobbler and the King. There once was a king who loved nothing better than to go out alone in the clothes of a commoner. He wanted to meet the ordinary people of his kingdom--to learn their way of life, and especially their way of thinking about the world. One night, this king found himself walking in the poorest, narrowest street of the city. This was the street of the Jews. He heard a song in the distance. The king thought, "A song sung in this place of poverty must be a lament!" But as he got closer, he could hear the true character of the song: it was a song of pride!

The king was drawn to the source of the song: the smallest, humblest shack on that street. He knocked on the door. "Is a stranger welcome here?" The voice from within said, "A stranger is God's gift. Come in!" In the dim light inside, the king saw a man sitting on the only piece of furniture, a wooden box. When the king came in, the man stood up and sat on the floor, offering the king the crate for a seat. "Well, my friend," the king asked, "what do you do to earn a living?" "Oh, I am a cobbler." "You have a shop where you make shoes?" "Oh, no, I could not afford a shop. I take my box of tools--you are sitting on it--to the side of the road. There I repair shoes for people as they need them." "You cobble shoes by the side of the road? Can you make enough money that way?" The cobbler spoke with both humility and pride. "Every day, I make just enough money to buy food for that day." "Just enough for one day? Aren't you afraid that one day you won't make enough, and then you'll go hungry?" The cobbler said, "Blessed be God, day by day."

The next day, the king determined to put this man's philosophy to the test. He issued a proclamation that anyone wishing to cobble shoes by the side of the road must purchase a license for fifty pieces of gold. That night, the king returned to the street of the Jews. Again he heard a song in the distance, and thought, "This time, the cobbler will be singing a different tune." But when the king neared the house he heard the cobbler sing the same song. Worse, it was even longer, with a new phrase that soared joyfully. The king knocked on the door. "Oh, my friend, I heard about that wicked king and his proclamation. I was so worried about you. Were you able to eat today?" "Oh, I was angry when I heard I could not make my living in the way I always have. But I knew: I am entitled to make a living and I will find a way. As I stood there saying those very words to myself, a group of people passed me by. When I asked them where they were going, they told me: into the forest to gather firewood. Every day, they bring back wood to sell as kindling. When I asked if I could join them, they said, 'There is a whole forest out there. Come along!' "And so I gathered fire wood. At the end of the day, I was able to sell it for just enough money to buy food for today." The king sputtered. "Just enough for one day? What about tomorrow? What about next week?" The cobbler said, "Blessed be God, day by day."

The next day, the king again returned to his throne, and issued a new proclamation: anyone caught gathering firewood in the royal forest would be inducted into the royal guard. For good measure, he issued another: no new members of the royal guard would be paid for forty days. That night, the king returned to the street of the Jews. Amazed, he heard the same song! But now, it had a third part that was militant and determined: The king knocked on the door. "Cobbler, what happened to you today?"

"They made me stand at attention all day in the royal guard! They issued me a sword and a scabbard. But then they told me I wouldn't be paid for forty days!" "Oh, my friend, I bet you wish now that you had saved some money." "Well, let me tell you what I did. At the end of the day, I looked at that metal sword blade. I thought to myself, that must be valuable! So I removed the blade from the handle, and fashioned another blade of wood. When the sword is in the scabbard, no one can tell the difference. I took the metal blade to a pawnbroker, and I pawned it for just enough money to buy food for one day." The king was stunned. "What if there's a sword inspection tomorrow?" The cobbler said, "Blessed be God, day by day."

The next day, the cobbler was pulled out of line in the king's guard. He was presented with a prisoner in chains. "Cobbler, this man has committed a horrible crime. You are to take him to the square. Using your sword, you are to behead him." "Behead him? I'm an observant Jew. I couldn't take another human life." If you do not, we'll kill both of you." The cobbler led this poor, trembling man into the square, where a crowd had gathered to watch the execution. The cobbler put the prisoner's head on the chopping block. He stood tall, his hand on the handle of his sword. Facing the crowd, he spoke. "Let God be my witness: I am no murderer! If this man is guilty as charged, let my sword be as always. But if he is innocent, let my sword turn to wood!" He pulled his sword. The people gasped when they saw the wooden blade. They bowed down at the great miracle that had happened there. The king, who had been watching all of this, came over to the cobbler. He took him by both his hands, and looked him deep in the eyes. "I am the king. And I am your friend who has visited you these last nights. I want you to come live with me in the palace and be my advisor. Please teach me how to live like that--one day at a time and trust the Lord."

We know it is so difficult to live one day at a time and not be overwhelmed by whatever issues confront us. Life, as we know all too well, is not perfect. Life can hurt and we get so caught up with what is wrong that it's hard to know how to be thankful. It's hard sometimes to see the good things that are right in front of us and around us.

You see gratitude is an attitude. A grateful heart does not come from telling ourselves we should be grateful. And no preacher, and no Thanksgiving sermon can make us live with grateful hearts. Thanksgiving doesn't come when the table is dressed to perfection or the house is filled with the latest gadgets, and all life's problems neatly solved.

Rather, Jesus tells us to stop, to look around, to take it all in – all of it, life in all its imperfect glory. The kingdom is here, spread out beneath our feet. The kingdom is in the scarlet of the early morning sun, or in the gentle autumn rain. We can see it in the face of a partner, or a child. It is in the holy heartbeat of life, if we only take time to listen for it.

Our prayer, then is not for the perfect life because the key to living with a grateful heart is to see what is right before us, around us; to look around, and take stock; to take snapshots for our souls. We all carry in our hearts our own snapshots for the soul. Look at them. Look around whatever table you happen to be at this week. Take it all in. Look into the faces around you and say a silent prayer of thanks, thanks that we are here, together, on this earth, a prayer of thanks for the gifts of life. Amen.
